In i906. Mitre died, the last survivor of those seven great men of the proscription. I knew Mitre in his home in the Calle San Martin, when he was the last great man that remained to us of the heroic days. I returned several times to that illustrious house in the course of my studies, and when I returned to it, it revived in me the recollection of the first visit that stirred my youth. Anointed by the glory of independence, whose archives he exhumed, and by the glory of proscription, in which he was an armed paladin and eloquent leader; the grand oration of his retirement having now been pronounced; serene in his old age and confident of the greatness of his country, he spoke to me, regarding his crowned life and my incipient vocation, serious words that I have not forgotten and the emotion of which palpitates, as a personal note, in these pages that I have dedicated to his lofty memory.
