Excerpt: . ing-room, walked heavily with it to that part of the veranda whence the sounds arose, balanced it for a moment on the rail: Confound those cats! he said, and flung the water, with a swish, plump onto the devoted head of poor little Miss Spice. Mr. Jellybond heard a half-drowned shriek as he retired to the window. Thence, by the bright moonlight, he watched the little woman, with dripping garments clinging to her limbs, the skimpy tail of her dress dragging behind her and making her look like a white bantam on a wet day, as she stumbled across the lawn and down the drive. It won t do you any harm, you dear, he said to himself, in his kind-hearted way. He had taken the water from the warm-water tap, so as not to give her too much of a shock. He...
