Excerpt: .He spoke about the new hotel, and her face lighted up. It was evidently a favourite subject. The workmen had been brought down from London by the contractors. There had been constant delays, for the bricklayers had struck first, and then the labourers. Local men would have been glad of the job, but were afraid to take it. Now work was kept on up till nine o'clock each night that the contract might be finished in time. He perceived with some annoyance that the girl's tone was contemptuous when she spoke of these workmen, and, from her remarks, he divined a jealousy in the district of this imported labour. They were a lazy, drunken set, she alleged, who did nothing but cause mischief. They wouldn't work themselves, and they wouldn't let others have a chance. Luke did not accept her...
