Amid all the improved ideas about the care of milk which have developed in the past decade, it has frequently been difficult for the architect to formulate conclusions from the mass of data compiled, and the many opinions expressed by those whose work has led them into the scientific analysis of milk and of milk production. In this search for facts, the author has come into contact with the bacteriologist - impressed by nothing but the thing he feels to be necessary to give a sterile sample of milk; with the enthusiastic herdsman - looking to a record for his cow, with no thought but for the...
