We will only add, that the principal highroads of Italy all issued from Rome, and that Rome was amply provided with excellent water by means of aqueducts, some of which are still in use. Among the other towns of Latium the following deserve to be noticed: --Ostia, on the left bank of the left arm of the Tiber, the port-town of Rome, is said to have been founded by Ancus Marcius. Owing to the deposits of the Tiber, its harbour, in the course of time, became useless, and a new one was built at the point where the Tiber divides, and was called Portus Augusti. Ostia was then allowed to fall into decay; Tibur, on the south bank of the river Anio, in a delightful district, with a splendid cascade in its neighbourhood. Owing to the beauty and salubrity of the country, numerous villas were built in its neighbourhood, the grandest of which was that of the emperor Hadrian; Tusculum, southeast of Rome, on a hill connected with Mons Albanus, was, and still is, a favourite resort of the Romans during the hot season of the year. Cicero had a villa in the neighbourhood; Alba Longa, one of the most ancient towns of Latium, at the foot of Mons Albanus, is described in the legends as the mother city of Rome; Laurentum, south-west of Rome, seems to have been an important place during the period of the...
