Excerpt: . . . plant flowers and vegetables in their home gardens or yards. Excursions under the direct supervision of the teacher either in or out of school hours, may be made most profitable, if the teacher has carefully planned the work to be done in advance. The objects of observation, the important questions to be asked, and the material to be correlated, should be thoroughly understood. Geography is a form of nature study and its introduction should be accomplished in accordance with the above principles. While it is impossible to teach the subject without a text-book, yet the text must be supplemented very largely with books of travel and description, magazine and newspaper articles, pictures, and cabinet collections. Teachers should form the habit of preserving and classifying such helpful material as may be found in current literature. Probably no other study has so many vague notions to contend...
