Excerpt from Some Aspects of the Religion of Sophokles There is a wide gulf separating the naif belief of the Homeric man in his humanized gods from the mystical pan theism of a Sophokles. But feeling the immediate presence of his god, he not only must have been constantly on the alert for a sign, be it in dream or portent, to guide his conduct; not only must have desired to draw near to that power, easily offended, to propitiate its anger and win its favor, - but at times must have felt an imperative need to lose himself in God, his own will in that of the Deity, to feel at one with it, in order to attain the blessedness and peace of mind of the truly religious man, - a need that may have found its fittest expression in devout acts of worship.
