Excerpt: .in our lives than the days that are gone, or even than those which are still with us. The past influences us as openly as the present. We yield graciously or ungraciously according to temperament, disposition, or whim. The upholders of tradition take the past into partnership, just as modernists in art and life declare war upon olden times. But the influence of the future is insidious and sly, making no fuss, demonstrating little, but pulling, pulling all things, always, in the interests of posterity. Nothing we do and nothing that others do to us are unaffected by this prevailing and powerful intrigue. Even any tendency to live unreservedly and wholly in the present, which is the aim of not a few, is curbed and guided by Nature's regard for posterity. Life is always cast receive it (with interest) after many fdays. I what..
