Excerpt: .act differently on these two species. In R. esculenta this alkaloid determines a paralysis of the motor nerves, and at the same time an increase in the excitability of the spinal cord. Of course, the influence on motor nerves prevents the spinal influence from being detected, unless the experiment is performed in a particular manner. In R. temporaria the symptoms are quite different; tetanic convulsions appear, and if the dose is considerable, motor paralysis ensues later. The case is the same with the common toad. 1 Cf. A.
