Excerpt from Master of the Vineyard Down in the bare, brown valley the river lay asleep. Grey patches of melting snow still filled the crevices along its banks, and frag ments of broken crystal moved slowly toward the ultimate sea. The late afternoon sun touched the Sharp edges, here and there to a faint iridescence. The river-god dreams of rainbows, thought Rosemary, with a Smile. Only one house was near the river; the others were set farther back. The one Upon the Shore was the oldest and largest house in the valley, severely Simple in line and with a certain air of stateliness. The broad, Colonial porch looked out Upon the river and the hills beyond it, while all around, Upon the southern Slope between the Opposite hills and the valley, were the great vineyards of the Marshs , that had descended from father to son during the century that had elapsed since the house was built. The gnarled and twisted vines scarcely showed now, Upon the grey-brown back ground of the soil, but in a few places, where the snow had not yet melted, the tangled black threads were visible. Like the frame surrounding a tapestry, great pines bordered the vineyard save on the Side nearest the valley, for the first of the Marshs, who had planted the vineyard and built the house, had taken care to protect his vines from the north-east storms. The clanging notes of a bell, mellowed by distance, came faintly from the valley below. Rosemary took out the thin, old watch that had been her mother s and her mother s...
