In a few more steps, as if by mutual agreement, we stopped, shook hands, and with a final good night , parted. He disappeared down the street, and suddenly Mom and I felt exhausted; it was time to get back to our hotel. Tomorrow would be another full day, but somehow we knew that nothing would surpass the events of this special night: the ferocious storm; our courtly escort from the taxi; our elegant dinner in the Willard Room; the evening walk by the White House; and above all, this remarkable encounter with a perfect stranger. This unforgettable experience is one of many that the author recounts in this graceful collection of personal essays. A Piano in the Pines chronicles her emotional and spiritual journey of Starting Over in America.
