Excerpt: .of the heart, of every delicate, noble, or violent sentiment, we find a most beautiful arrangement of the muscles of the face; we find no strong tendons, as in the wrist, where great force has to be exerted in grasping, very few attachments to the bones below; but the face is covered by a layer of living contractile muscles, with their fibres arranged in every possible direction, circular, direct, oblique, running into one another, capable of the utmost mobility, and instantaneous response to the slightest change of feeling. The countenance was never intended as a mask to the soul, for every provision has been made to render it the faithful image of every changing sentiment. Now, constituting, as the muscles do, the great bulk of the body, they must necessarily require an immense supply of blood, and consequently the largest vessels branch off in...
