Excerpt: . . . or distant areas producing them; clothing materials through stores to the cotton fields or sheep ranches, with some general details of their production; woods used in buildings and furnishings through lumberyards to the forests; bricks to the brickyards where they are made; stone to the quarries; and clays used in dishes, metals used in hardware, and fuels for heat and light through local markets to the factories and mines, always using maps, is a means of developing a sense of geographical and occupational interdependence and of the reality and meaning of geographic controls. The more detailed the study of the occupations and projects of the home community and its immediate environment, with the reasons why these activities may be carried on because of resources, climate, and location, the better the basis made for interpreting the meaning of occupations, controls, and relationships of distant localities. Local facts of immigration and emigration raise questions of the nationality, homes, work, and reasons for change of homes by immigrants, and of the reasons why other localities appeal to those who emigrate. In the study of local production both helpful and harmful forms of wild plant and animal life should be regarded as a part of the geographic environment. Useful forms include fruits, nuts, woods, game, and most birds. Harmful forms will be recognized in weeds, poisonous plants, insect pests, and destructive rodents or other animals. These should be taken up in definite connection with questions to which they...
