If the petition asks for too much, it must be dismissed. That is, if it asks for more than the defendant is bound to do.1 A variance in the petition and alternative words is not fatal;2 but a variance in substance is fatal. If the defendant desires to object on the ground that it is not a corporation, the objection must be plead or it will be treated as waived.3 The writ may be issued by any court or judge who has power to issue an injunction.4 Unless the statute provides otherwise a mandamus against a public officer abates at his death, or removal from office.5 Allegations of conclusions of law, and equivocal pleading is insufficient. The return must set forth matters that show a legal or proper excuse or reason...
