Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Russia: Report on the Waterway Between the Baltic and Black Sea Some time ago a number of articles appeared in different newspaper and journals on the subject of inland navigation in Russia, and, with a view to bringing into greater service the principal waterways of the Empire, a variety of suggestions were brought forward, amongst which was the gigantic idea of converting the Duna and Dnieper into a deep-water canal from the Baltic to the Black Sea. AS this latter project has attracted considerable attention, I have ventured to gather a few facts concerning the character of the rivers here mentioned, the measures that have been taken to improve their navigation, and the possibility of carrying into effect a scheme of such magnitude as that referred to. More than a century ago the Duna was connected by a series of canals with the Berezina, one of the tributaries of the Dnieper, and produce from the central provinces of Russia, found its way to Riga by this route. But, with the introduction of railways, water transport gradually died out, and everything, with the exception of timber, is now carried by rail. From time to time efforts have been made to induce the Ministry of Ways and Communications to improve the condition of this waterway, and to render it more available for the transport of timber, if for nothing else, but beyond granting small sums of money for the purpose of putting the locks into repair, nothing has been done. As far back as the early forties, the urgency for improving the navigation of the rivers and canals was strongly represented to the Imperial Government, and a...
