Nature in general, History, Geography, Science, and c. and c. of every thing, indeed, that the author deemed it necessary for himself to know, in order to produce his work as it actually exists. He is in thorough possession of the unembodied essence of all the subjects of knowledge just mentioned, though he is not made to stumble and start at their technical nomenclature. Nothing remains but to evolve the various elements, and they are then seen to assume the form and character of distinct sciences. But this is not all; from particular facts, and the particular reflections connected with them, the pupils mind is led on to analyse circumstances in the aggregate, --to generalize, --to trace the method pervading the whole, --to see the reason of that method, --and thus to enter into the very spirit of his author, and to understand every...
