Daniel Perkins Dewey: Of the Twenty-Fifth Regiment, Connecticut Volunteers When this fearful war shall be ended, and this broad land, from one end to the other, shall echo to the bells of cheer as they ring peace and freedom in; when our cities, towns and villages shall receive their own again, saved from the bloody fields of strife; and when households are made more than happy by the welcome footsteps of returning fathers, husbands, sons and brethren, kindred and friends, it will be with us as it was with Judah of old when the captivity of Zion was released from its bondage; we shall be like them that dream - our heart so filled with transport, our mouth will be filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing; - we shall rehearse the mighty deliverances as one after another tells his thrilling story, and we shall respond to each other, as they did to the exclamations of the wondering heathen around them, Yea, the Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we rejoice.
