Not illustrated. 1845 Excerpt: . to his bed, with the pleasant prospect before him of a tedious illness; at that very season of the year, too, when the exertions of the head of a poor family to earn bread for his household can least easily be dispensed with. Mr. Dadds was not a bad man, in the extreme sense of that term. He paid his bills regularly. He acted up to the letter of every engagement into which he might happen to enter. Whatever he agreed to give to his workpeople he gave them, and was not more rude in his style of address than his neighbours. But Mr. Dadds loved money. He had no notion, moreover, of resisting the tide of popular opinion, especially when it set in in favour of low wages, and what was assumed to be an economical system of farming; and hence, though he went and saw poor Brown in his bed, and sent him some mutton once or twice, and a little strong beer, he did not propose, what indeed Brown had no right to expect, to continue the sick man s weekly allowance during his sickness. Neither did it occur to him that Timothy s sons might be made available in their father s room. He found for them no increase of employment. If he wanted a lad, from time to time, to assist the looker, or dig turnips for the sheep, he would send for George or Jem (seldom for both together),...
