As protection against absorption of these waste and poisonous substances, the colon, with the exception of the cecum, is supplied with very few absorbent vessels, and, in addition, nature has wisely provided this filth receptacle with a valve at each end. The lower valve prevents the untimely escape of the colon contents, while the upper valve prevents the backing up of putrefying and poisonous materials into the small intestine, that portion of the bowel in which absorption takes place with the greatest rapidity. It is now generally conceded that ileal stasis is a controlling factor in the genesis of intestinal toxemia. However views may differ respecting the value of the operations proposed by Lane for correcting ileal stasis, it must be admitted that his work has been of immense practical service by demonstrating the immediate causative relation between ileal stasis and a considerable number of exceedingly common and disabling ailments, which the remarkable results obtained in many of Mr. Lane s cases have proven to be directly dependent upon intestinal toxemia. According to A. Schmidt, indol, one of the most constant products of putrefaction in the colon is not found in the small intestine under normal conditions. Adami and other authorities confirm this observation. Ewald, Menche and Jakowski showed that in cases of a fistulous small intestine it was impossible to find even traces of putrefaction products, such as phenol, skatol...
