CHAPTER III THE ORIGINS OF GODS The next task is to discover to which of the gods may be assigned the representation of the several estates of human life enumerated in the last chapter. In order to accomplish this, certain tests must be formulated, and the deities classified in accordance with the principles embodied in those tests. As it has been laid down that the divine family is formed by analogy with the human, We shall call father-gods, those gods whose position most nearly approaches that of the human father, and by a corresponding process we shall discover the mother-, son-, and daughter-deities. Maturity and capability to govern and direct, and to impose laws, are the proper characteristics of the human father. The province of the mother lies in the regulation of the household, the care of children, and the upholding of the sanctity of marriage. The son will follow those pursuits, active or skilful, which the father has left behind with his youth, and the daughter will find occupation in the womanly handicrafts. Briefly, the province of the more mature estate lies in being, that of the younger, in doing. Thus the gods whose mere existence is their patent of authority--who rule the world without especial reference to man--will be the parent-gods, while those who direct the arts of mankind will be the sons and daughters of the divine family. It is not to be expected that these tests should exactly fit..
