Singing like Callas and Caruso Belcanto Voice and Body Training is not an academic code for Opera singers, even if it introduces you into all secrets of your authentic voice. Dr. Karin Wettig started as a pilgrim to the Rome of Singers after her divorce: not her heart, but her voice broke. The irony of fate sent her to a radio station to become a speaker. Whatever she tried with her voice, nothing really worked. Instead of taking the highway, she felt like creeping on her knees to Rome, where she arrived as a secret pupil of the Papal chapel in Renaissance, staring through a Judas hole to observe how the young castratos studied singing. Fascinated with Belcanto since 1600, her personal vocal studies ended constantly in disasters: she fell asleep in classes of an empathetic lady; a Japanese piano professor shouted encouragement and pushed her through old Italian arias until her voice had broken into two: a rough alto and a squeaking soprano and nearly nothing but a throaty flow of air in between. The next teacher, a tenor...
