He then, in his fiery manner, demands of the Frenchman, who is totally ignorant of the English language, Art thou a gentleman? What is thy name? thinking, that words so plain must be understood. The old reading should certainly be restored; and which, though gibberish, has a much better effect than the sense, forced out of what our Author, designedly, made--nonsense. In a subsequent speech, when the Frenchman says, pardonnez moy! he sounds it partonnez moy! a manner in which many polite Frenchmen sound it at present, particularly in the northern parts of France: and by this mode of pronunciation, Pistol understands him to mean--a ton of moys. Scene IV.--page 466. Pistol. Moy shall not serve, I will have forty moys; For I will fetch thy rim out at thy throat, In drops of crimson blood. This passage is, perhaps, the most difficult in our Author s plays; for, even were the text correct, its meaning is so hid, that our best Commentators might have found it an arduous task to elucidate; as an intimacy with the guttural manner in which many of the French sound r is absolutely necessary. And, indeed, this passage is also of very great importance to establish, in a certain degree, Shakspeare s erudition; as it removes every doubt respecting his knowledge of the French language; for, assuredly, he must have been perfectly conversant in it, when he displays a discrimination in point of accent, which home education seldom attains....
