Why are you--a strange woman--here? It is I, Helga! Don t you know me? Three minutes ago we spolre together yonder on the verandah. You re making a mistake, said the stork; you have dreamt all that. No, no, she said, and reminded him of the Viking s castle and the great sea, of the joumey hither. Then stork-papa blinked his eyes. Why, that s an old story that I have heard tell of my greatgrandfathefs time I There certainly was such a princess here from the land of Denmark, but she disappeared on the evening of her wedding-day many hundred years ago, and never came back. You can read it for yourself on the monument in the garden yonder; swans and storks have been inscribed upon it, and at the top you will find yourself in white marble. It was so. Helga saw it, understood it, and fell upon her knees. The sun burst forth in splendour; and as once the frog-covering used to vanish at its rays and the lovely form appear, so now there rose in the baptism of light a form of beauty, brighter and purer than the air--a ray of light that rose up to its Father. The body crumbled into dust: a faded lotus-flower lay where Helga had stood. Well, that was a new end to the story, said storx-papa; I had certainly not expected that. But I am very pleased with it. I wonder...
