Nearly every bone in the body is described. The twentyfour vertebrae are divided into three classes: seven cervical, twelve dorsal, and five lumbar. The peculiarities of the atlas and of the vertebra dentata are carefully noted and made to explain the forward, backward, and rotary movements of the head upon the spinal column. The following is an example of his descriptions: The third vertebra has eminences by which it is connected with the next inferior one. All the others are articulated with those below by processes inclining downwards, and by corresponding depressions which they have on each side they receive the superior ones, and are secured by many ligaments on each side, and an abundance of inter-articular cartilage. And thus a moderate degree of flexion is readily given to a man as he stands erect, and is as readily counteracted when the necessity of his operations require him to bend. Thus he goes on to describe the several bones of the body and to indicate their functions. The muscles and ligaments are only mentioned in a general way, no attempt being made to use special names for any of them. In these anatomical chapters we meet the same names of parts which are employed at the present time, the students of today are repeating the technical terms which were familiar to the students in the first century, and in some instances to those of the Alexandrian school, several centuries previous...
