Generally all of these forms have a high degree of thecal streamlining and bilaterality (but rarely are they truly bilateral). In most, a rim of substantial marginal plates surrounds the exible polyplated central surfaces on both inferior and superior surfaces. In some, one or both somatic surfaces are also regularized into rigid surfaces. Ventral or inferior surfaces are commonly concave, with the marginals serving as runners or skids to minimize adhesion to the bottom. In many forms, appendages such as columns, steles, and aulacophores were adapted to serve locomotor functions. These recumbent forms not only exploited a similar food source, but in doing so exercised some degree of vagility in moving from place to place using their elongated appendage, or, minimally, were sufficiently vagile to favorably orient themselves on the sea floor relative to nutrient-bearing currents.
