Excerpt: My chest began to feel as if it had been pumped full of air and lack of oxygen made me drowsy. Now the wild peaks were all around us as we flew through a pass so narrow it seemed that I could reach out and touch the mountainside. In the open again, an updraft caught our plane and buffeted it mercilessly. I clung tensely to the arms of my seat, as the old plane strained and shuddered in the powerful air current. Suddenly, the turbulence subsided, and just below was a green mountain meadow, set beside a jewel-like lake. We were all gasping from lack of oxygen now, but we knew that this antiquated plane carried a supply sufficient only for emergencies. Unless we passed out or became very ill, we wouldn t get any.
