Not illustrated. 1860 Excerpt: .as the children called her, and asked her for some pieces of silk, and scraps of cloth; she was very bountiful, and gave us some pieces of ribbon besides; we took our treasures, our little red workboxes, and the dolls, to a room in the roof--a large, partially empty place, where we were sometimes allowed to play--and there, with infinite care and pains, we made each of them a dove-colored silk gown of the most approved shape, a muslin handkerchief, a three cornered brown shawl, and a proper silk bonnet; when the clothes were finished we wetted the hair of the dolls to take out the curl, and then dressed them, and took them down into the hall, where we walked about with them by way of giving them an airing. I never saw Lucy s father laugh heartily but once, and it was on that occasion; the sight of the Puppet Friends, as he called them, quite overcame his habitual gravity; unluckily, we presently met Lucy s grandmother, who was far from regarding them with the same good-humored indulgence, and it was a painful fact to us, at the time, that after we were gone to bed, the Puppet Friends, mysteriously disappeared; where they went to we never could discover, though we shrewdly suspected that the grandmother knew; but the mystery was never cleared up till after I returned to school, when I found them among my clothes, neatly wrapped in silver paper, but divested...
