For years Africa (including the Islamic faith) has been known to be mainly a polygamous society. In such a culture the frequent degree of a mans communal success is measured by the amount of wives he has; therefore, as a man becomes richer he usually marries more women to reflect his improved financial status. Yet a few weeks ago I saw a program on Australian TV whereby an Australian man had eight wives. Times have indeed changed. One can just picture, the scene in such a domicile, whereby, the presence of two or more woman competing for the love, attention and money of one man can become a war zone. This as you might expect creates a lot of envy, jealousy, bitterness and rivalry among the woman. In Africa, witchcraft and other forms of magic are used extensively to efficiently encapsulate the love and attention of the men involved and to cast out rivals from the marital home. Thus, one commonly finds a man with, say, three or more wives but who gives his utmost attention to the one least worthy of love,...
