Excerpt: . . . would suddenly fall to the ground with violence. After a time a farm house was reached, but there was no remedy to be found there that the author had ever made use of. But something had to be done or the horse would soon die. In the absence of a regular syringe one was substituted, which was hastily manufactured from a large cane, and with it the horse was given an injection of about two ounces of tobacco juice. This made him very sick; he could scarcely stand upon his feet; his muscles were relaxed, and within a few minutes the animal was fully relieved. This was our first experience with an injection of tobacco juice, but have since that time made use of it in extreme cases, when other remedies had failed, with the most satisfactory results. INFLAMMATION OF THE KIDNEYS. This disease...
