Not illustrated. 1917 Excerpt: .passage there may occur many changes of string; (2) to change the bow-stroke very smoothly, for a legato passage may require a change of bow-stroke at many points. In fact the whole piece may call for legato style, and furthermore, each note therein may require a separate bow-stroke without disturbing the prevailing legato; in which case a successful rendering depends upon how smoothly the change of stroke is made. To connect slurred tones on the violin is simple, when one has mastered the problem of crossing strings; but to connect tones between which there is a change of bow-stroke is quite another matter, and requires great care. The following directions will aid greatly in mastering these two essentials: In order to pass from one string to another without a break between the two tones, or an accent on the second tone, the arm, together with the hand, must begin to turn the bow with a rounded motion toward the new string, while yet playing the note preceding the change, so that when it is time to sound the note on the new string, the bow is already near it. The speed with which the bow is turned varies with the time-value of the note preceding the change. The player should plan to reach the new string just in time to sound the new note. When a study or passage in a piece necessitates successive changes of string, as in the following examples, the changes are made..
