Excerpt: . . . of the first habits, which will constitute the plane of future habits, are in this view of vast importance, and exert a most decided influence both upon the child and the parent. On the child by training it up from the beginning in the way it should go, and on the mother, by beginning early to habituate herself to system and regularity, which will become more and more necessary, as the infant advances into the state of childhood. In this early spring, this seed time of life; this season of sacred, tender affection and endearment, are to be stored up. In the inmost nature of the little innocent, the first rudiments of those latent, filial affections, which are to form the ground of a celestial, heavenly influence, to temper, to restrain and sustain us in the conflicts incident to human existence. It is of great importance, to...
