Excerpt from Psychology and Higher Life This book grew out of a course of lectures delivered to the freshman students in the Kansas Agricultural College. It is intended to present the subject-matter of descriptive psychology in such a way as to constitute a simple textbook for the younger student and at the same time to furnish instructive reading for a much larger constituency. In every chapter I have had in mind that ever-increasing host of persons who, aside from the routine affairs of life, are giving their attention to the study and conquest of self. I am especially interested in the man who is down in any walk of life, and I believe that a closer sympathy among all classes can be brought about by means of a better knowledge of the self. Finally, I am in sympathy with the students of the so-called higher thought, but it seems to me that in every case such persons will find a more rational basis for their thinking and writing through a careful study of the underlying laws of mind - a matter which many of them have neglected or overlooked.
