CHAPTER XXIII VICTOEY The dreadful Thursday arrived--Election day. Of course, Overbys name had been withdrawn, and another candidate had entered the field. The election was one of the most exciting events in the whole history of Byington. It was the struggle of intelligence over ignorance, of truth over error. Strange, that when the shades of night enveloped the earth it was announced, amid the loud huzzas of the party in power, that Nicodemus Noddimus was elected Senator by an overwhelming majority. That was a mournful day for the good people of the State. And it was followed by weary months of oppression and thralldom ere the clouds were rolled back and right became triumphant. The modest rooms of Noddimus were now exchanged for a sumptuous suite of apartments in the most fashionable hotel of the town. His carriage was drawn by two dashing bays, and a fawning man-servant stood ready to obey his slightest whim. When not in Washington, his reckless extravagance, his fine suppers and choice wines were themes for the busy tongues of Byington; but, to the honor of the people he had wronged be it said, none of the better class were partakers of his hospitality. In Washington society he made his entree, however, with much eclat, and many were the significant whispers of aspiring mothers possessing marriageable daughters, who saw in this nouveau riche a decided catch. In the meantime, Mrs. Dacre had returned from her prolonged European tour, and by...
