Should this position prove correct, the ebb tide can have no power on the Bar beyond the force derivable from its weight of water, with the generally trivial aid of the stream of the Liffey. Supposing it practical to remove the Bar, the cause of its formation must likewise be obviated, to secure any permanent advantage from such removal. Another Engineer, indeed, in his observations on the drift of sand on the Bar when disturbed by shoal scrubbers, found that in various winds, the first of the flood carried the sand towards Sutton; that in the progress of the flood tide the sand was carried northward, directly upon the North Bull; and lastly, in a north-west direction towards Clontarf; but at no time of the flood was it carried...
