Excerpt from Standards of Living of the Residents of Seven Rural Resettlement Communities: October 1938 It has long been recognized that the problem of changing a family's level of living cannot be considered exclusively from the standpoint of the individual family. The level of living of any family as a production and consumption or social - participating unit is definitely a function of the relationship of that family to the other individuals and other families in the community. Consequently, it has frequently been maintained that the community should be the smallest unit to be considered in any effort to alter living conditions. Occasionally Governments or private individuals have attempted to create better communities. It cannot be said that all such plans have had exactly the same objective, but certainly all of them have had as their final goal a more abundant life. Although no two conceptions of the abundant life may concur, there has been agreement of Opinion that the proposed programs should contribute to a higher level of living, both material and non-material. During the last 4 years the Federal Government of the United States has tried its hand at building new communities. Many important considerations led the Government to undertake this new and extremely difficult venture. The most far - reaching depression in history had brought uncertainty and poverty to millions. The laissez - faire system of settlement and exploitation of natural resources had left in its wake a toll of exhausted and eroded agricultural lands, depleted forests, and stranded families and villages. There was too much raw material and large inventories of stored manufactured goods on the one hand, and, on the other hand, people were...
