Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Excerpt from The Fatal Necklace: A Burlesque Melodrama, in One Act Scene: A drawing room. See description of Stage Setting. Discovered, the Heroine in the dress of a maid dusting the furniture. The Villain enters R. He wears riding boots and carries a crop. Villain. Ah! Here you are, my pretty one. At last I have a chance to speak with you alone. Heroine. Alas, sir, why should you wish to speak with me? I am only a poor housemaid and you, you are heir to an earldom. Villain. Tell me, how would you like to be a lady, to wear silks and satins, to ride in a carriage, with servants to wait upon you and fulfill your every wish? How would you like to be a countess? Heroine. Ah, no, sir; such things are not for me. I am only a poor serving maid. But I was not, always one. I can remember back to a fair day when I was small. It must have been when I was a child, and there was a fair lady with golden curls and jewels about her neck - diamonds. Villain. Bah! You are dreaming. I would talk of the things that are real. You are a housemaid and I am the heir to an earldom. How would you like to share that earldom with me? Heroine. Ah, sir, you are jesting. Villain. I was never more in earnest. Come; one kiss from those pretty lips to seal the bargain. Heroine. Stop! Do not touch me. Why do you think that I do not know what you are, humble though I am? To yield to you would be to...
