Not illustrated. 1899 Excerpt: .Their walls are very thin, except at the apical portions, where they are thickened and composed of dense fibrous tissue; these portions project into the ventricle; the openings are horizontal slits bounded by the thickened tissue which forms a pair of valves preventing the reflux of the blood into the auricles during the ventricular systole. On the floor of the pericardium, beneath the ventricle, are the openings of the reno-pericardial canals. On the anterior part of the floor are several openings which are the terminal portions of systems of tubules forming the paired pericardial glands. The tubules are lined with cells containing brownish-red concretions, and are distributed over a wedge-shaped area of the mantle extending, ventrally, from the most dorsal portion. The ventricle is prolonged backwards into a short narrow neck which still contains the rectum. A transverse membranous partition, beginning at the dorsal surface of this neck, extends backwards and downwards across its cavity, embracing the rectum, and ends so that its free edge lies near the ventral surface. This must form a valve preventing the reflux of blood into the ventricle from the posterior part of the body. Behind this valve the tube expands forming a bulbus arteriosus (B.a., fig. 30) with thin muscular walls. This terminates in two lateral branches, the right and left posterior pallial arteries which diverge from each other and pass backwards beneath the posterior adductor. Here their walls become very illdefined and communicate freely with a system of lacunae...
