Excerpt: . . . from that, as apparently cured, but that the fits came on again, and she was therefore made a patient of the second. This evidence having been partially corroborated by that of a girl named Louisa Lake, Mr. Vann addressed the magistrate on behalf of his client, denying the charge altogether, and contending that it had been preferred in consequence of former disagreements between the women; but Mr. Hammill said that it was a very extraordinary case, and one that he regarded in a serious light; he should therefore order the further hearing of it to be adjourned for a week, and in the mean time the officer must endeavour to procure the attendance of some of the medical gentlemen under whose care the child had been placed, to depose to the condition in which they had found her, and the probable cause of such a...
