Frederic Villot With an artist, too, the shape-giving and representing impulse is, of its nature, entirely instinctive and unconscious; even where he requires reflection in order to mature the type of his intuition into an objective work of art, the definite choice of his means of expression will not so much be determined by conscious thought as by that spontaneous intuition which constitutes the character of his individual genius. He will not feel the necessity of continuous reflection until he meets with a considerable impediment in applying the requisite means, of expressing his idea-that is to say, at the moment when he feels that the means for the representation of his artistic idea are insufficient, or perhaps utterly wanting. The latter will more especially be the case of an artist who for the realisation of his idea depends not alone on inanimate instruments, but upon a combination of living artistic powers as well. Now, such a combination in the very widest sense is absolutely necessary to the dramatist who aims at a perfectly intelligible representation of his poem; for to attain this end he requires the stage, which, including all the arts of representation, with their peculiar laws, is in itself a perfectly distinct branch of art. Approaching the stage, then, the dramatist finds in it a ready-made element of art; in order to see his artistic idea realized, he must amalgamate himself with it, and with all its peculiarities.
