Excerpt from Contributions From the Pathological Laboratory, 1913-1914, Vol. 6 The statistical study of carcinoma is regarded by many writers as having been carried as far as it can be profitable; and certainly but little that is new has been gained through this method during the last decade. Nevertheless, its possibilities have not been exhausted; and it is highly desirable that the whole neoplasm problem in all of its aspects be attacked again from the statistical standpoint, though in a somewhat different way. Practically all of the old statistical studies of neoplasms, particularly those of carcinoma, were based on mortality reports; or if not on these, on morbidity reports based on clinical diagnoses. In very few instances only has the statistical study been carried out on the basis of the records of a diagnostic pathological laboratory. Statistics of neoplasm from such a source must be of infinitely greater value than those founded on mortality statistics. In the records of the diagnostic laboratory the diagnosis is based on the histological examination, and the percentage of error is reduced to a minimum. In the mortality statistics, on the other hand, the diagnoses are chiefly clinical, and consequently subject to the wide error inherent in the clinical diagnosis of tumor, neoplasm, cancer and the like. Moreover, the material coming to the diagnostic laboratory is usually seen from two to five years earlier than the mortality age. In studies relating to the age-incidence of any form of neoplasm it is evident that the records of the pathological laboratory for that neoplasm will be much more trustworthy than the mortality statistics. It is also possible many times in the diagnostic laboratory to follow the course of a...
