If we look back over the page of secular history, we can trace many of the developements of the present age to causes which are far removed by time. When we view the sturdy oak, whose massive trunk has stood the shock of many rude tempests, and whose boughs are continually spreading and putting on new foliage, we know that once, perhaps scores of years, or centuries ago its germ was concealed within the husks of the tiny acorn. So the germ of many of the institutions of the present day was enveloped in the revolutions of past ages. We are able to assign to each of them its due importance, because we can trace their developement in the record of history and witness their bearing upon the present condition of society. The Israelites entered into the possession of Canaan with grateful hearts, regarding it as the land long promised to the seed of faithful Abraham, and as their goodly heritage. They fought long and bravely with the idolatrous nations who had obtained it; but they could not have anticipated the important results which were pending the issue of this conflict.
