I am now in a little haste, and so you are eased from any farther trouble. Your very affectionate friend and servant, E. Gibson. My service to your fellow-travellers. FROM DR. HENRY SAMPSON. HONoured SIR, London, July 23, 1695. I received yours yesterday, almost at the same hour when Mr. Howe had sent me your papers to peruse, whilst he goes his western circuit: an unexpected coincidence. I was reading with pleasure your Memoirs of your worthy Father, then comes in your letter to make them more pleasurable: plates of sweetmeats are not the less grateful because they are double. I shall, at your desire, read over those, and your other papers, more leisurely; and though I cannot pretend to be critical, yet I shall adventure to speak my poor thoughts of them. I observe you are loth to displease the churchmen with any reflections; but sore eyes will never endure the light, though it strike them never so gently. I perceive your father was a good man, that is enough to gall some of them, --Bonus homo Caius, sed Christianus, was the old eye-sore; for he was not wholly theirs: --I speak only of them of the high church, such as the ante-penultimate Vicar at Leeds (the Doctor), if I mistake not a wretched book that goes under his name. I am, at present, very busy in writing out some Memoirs of the holy life of an excellent...
