Flint Dugdale, blunt Yorkshireman and reality TV show winner, seems an unlikely contender for First Man on Mars. The Right Stuff he is not. But the tragic death of the Mars missions brave commander has created a vacancy which Dugdale, with his large frame and persuasive personality, has been quick to fill. He has put himself in charge of Britains first group of quirky characters to land on the Red Planet. With a place in History assured, Dugdale plans to see out the rest of the mission to Mars drinking lager, eating pies and watching his favourite sports on wide-screen TV. But all is not well on the Martian surface. For five years an advance party of offbeat robots with evolving AI personalities have been building Botany Base. They are a long way behind schedule and have made some crucial dimensioning errors. So the bases rooms are too small, the doors dont fit, and the lift-shaft is too narrow for the space elevator that is to bring the humans down from their spaceship. Worse, the food supplies sent from Earth have mysteriously gone missing, the drinking-water is muddy, and the Polish builder bots have gone AWOL. On the eve of the landing, Dugdale knows nothing of these problems nor the weird weather on the surface. And he is also unaware that the ships scanners have detected living organisms two miles north of the base. It seems there is Life down there. But will it be pleased to see him This is a very enjoyable manuscript. It bounces along, funny and silly and wicked by turns, and fits into a well-established genre
