Excerpt from United Empire, 1919, Vol. 10: The Royal Colonial Institute Journal One term of settlement which has been persistently urged by the German people is that their captured colonies should be restored to them. True, the belligerents have more or less acquiesced in the formula no indemnities and no annexations, and Great Britain has declared to the world that the War was entered upon for higher purposes than the mere grasping of fresh territory. The above, then, may be accepted as a broad statement of policy; yet it is impossible to deny that the security of the Commonwealth of Australia and of New Zealand would be gravely affected by the restoration to the Germans of their Pacific colonies. Their fate is of vital importance to Australasia. A glance at the map shows that the Polynesian group is bounded on the west and south by Australia and New Zealand, on the east by North and South America, and on the north by a line formed by the late German possessions. The islands of Polynesia all lie with-in the tropical region. For the most part they are productive, and under proper cultivation would become even prolific. The climate is not unsuitable for white men, and this archipelago is capable of supporting a teeming population, who would be subject to the controlling influence of some dominant white people. Near by lies Australasia, endowed with unlimited wealth in minerals and agricultural possibilities, but handicapped by the immensity of its vacant Spaces. Australia and New Zealand together represent, in area, about a quarter of the British Empire, but they cannot claim more than an eightieth of the total population. For many years the hungry eyes of congested...
