Very slowly their lips approached each other, and like a flower coming slowly into bloom in the summer night, their kiss was given deeply each to each. Then, arms around each other, they walked down the path to the sea. They found their favourite comfortable rock, and settled into a hollow of it, too much in accord to need speech. The silver radiance stretched before them with a sense of infinite rest. Night laid her brooding wings of tenderness over the tired earth, and all the cares of day, all temporary concerns, seemed to slip along the glimmering ripples, and vanish over the far horizon, into some other world. The splendour of the mystical hour tranquillized their souls to an intimacy deeper than passion. They leaned softly together, full, to the hearts brim, of...
