Not illustrated. 1918 Excerpt: . of one of the? ast-steel bearings, has brought to the foreground the question as to whether cast steel is a suitable material for bridge construction. Cast steel for bearings has the advantage that it can be built into forms and thicknesses for which riveted work is impracticable. Large teel castings, however, are difficult to make. Experience has shown hat unless great care is taken in casting the metal, internal defects nay develop, which are difficult to detect. Further, unless properly mnealed, as soon as the cores are removed, or after any subsequent ocal heating, internal stresses will remain in the casting, and may be arge enough to cause breakage under slight shock. This applies larticularly to complicated castings, or castings in which the metal-aries considerably in thickness and, therefore, does not cool uniformly. Simplicity and uniform thickness, therefore, should be the aim in lesigning the castings....
