Excerpt: . . . out this, which was a monument of national approbation of Irelands sons, whom he had so many years led in the paths of honour and danger; but, as frequently happens, the rewards were not enjoyed by those who deserved them, and it was no wonder that those to whom they fell could not very well account for the causes of their coming, and should thus abuse them. Seriously, it is imperative upon us to consider, and be just to others as to ourselves. If honest Englishmen would not allow us to be ill-used or insulted when we were in bondage, even by the duke himself, had he been inclined thatward, they will not allow us, now enlarged, to insult with impunity others, among them some of our best friends, or ascribe, even jeeringly, to a fellowprisoner, as a rescue, what was legally obtained from the friendship of some, the reluctance of many, the liberality of numbers, and the goodwishes of all, by that leader indeed, who never led but to victory. With Irelands immortal general, comes naturally her immortal bard, Thomas Moore, Esq. Whose magic lyre and lute seem unknown to, unheard by, his countrymen. Had Pope lived to have modulated through the Melodies, looking at the ever perturbed state of Ireland, he would have erased from his Ode on St. Cecilias Day that enchanting passage, By music, minrls an equal temper know, Nor swell too high Intestine wars no more our passions wage,...
