Global governance is bound to be undemocratic because, according to Dahrendorf, Internationalisation almost invariably means a loss of democracy 1. Why and if this is the case will be examined in this essay. Governance, in contrast to government<sup>2</sup>, refers to the process of making collective decisions, [...] in international relations, for example, no world government exists to resolve problems but many issues are resolved by negotiation 3. After a discussion about democracy in this context, the focus will be laid on different global intergovernmental organisations (IGOs), followed by a future outlook over possible future alternative possibilities and restraints. It will be shown that international democratic decision making is not likely to happen. Before entering the discussion, it is necessary to define what the term democracy` refers to. Normally it is used in a national context, and even within this context there exist various forms in parallel in neighbouring nations, whose political styles span from governmental to federal, and from one party to multiple party systems. Regarding the international order, which can be seen as a society of states, definition becomes more difficult. A basic definition is offered by the MSN Encarta as follows: A political system in which the people of a country rule through any form of government they choose to establish 4; but this refers merely to the people` and to a permanent institutional idea that...
