Bagshaw (1996: p.16) suggests that the dynamic people of today's dynamic world are attracted to jobs where they can see clear development for themselves, with opportunities spreading in all directions. Accordingly, employees increasingly demand the possibility to develop themselves and their careers within the organisation. Employees who are able and willing to participate in development programmes should be more motivated and higher skilled than their non-developing colleagues. These development programmes should provide a certain career satisfaction, which Gattiker and Larwood (1988) define as a stimulated response to career and work events and significantly correlate with the employee's motivation. To create motivated and high-skilled workforce, some organisations introduced different approaches...
