Excerpt: .He said nothing to her, however, of what he had seen, as he perceived that she did not know it, ana he did not wish to frighten her. She said she had taken her guitar that evening, as soon as she had finished her supper, but had fallen asleep as usual. She asked the Prince, Do you play? aud he said, Only a little; and then they walked around the room, and looked at all the instruments, to see if there were any that the Prince could play on better than the rest. He wished her to perform, but she urged him, and he soon saw a hand-organ, and said he was pretty sure that he could play on that. So he tried, and, sure enough, he could play very well, and the Princess sat down on the floor by him, and he played for almost an hour and three quarters, and they were both very much pleased. Then the Prince s arm got tired, and he stopped and asked the Princess to tell him her history. She said she was a little ashamed to tell him her story, because he plight think thai she was not of as good descent as himself; but the Prince insisting, she told him that her mother was a water-woman. A mermaid, I suppose? said the Prince. O no! she cried, none of those low things with fish-tails, but a real princess of the ocean. Sho lived in...
